Mentee Guidelines

The first meeting should include the setting of expectations - particular components of the business you would like to learn, or areas in which you would like to expand your knowledge. A meeting schedule for the balance of the year should be established at this first meeting as well. Types of questions asked vary by relationship and there are no right or wrong questions to ask. During the expectation setting phase of the relationship, ground rules should be set so that each individual in the relationship is comfortable sharing information. You do not need to have a major business issue to get in touch with your Mentor. The breadth of topics and situations you discuss with your Mentor will develop and change as your relationship develops and changes over time – there is no prescription.

Mentor Guidelines

The Mentor's responsibility is to act as a coach and sounding board for the Mentee and to not be the sole source of knowledge for all of the Mentee's issues. Mentors are also encouraged to attend Leadership Academy events, so that they can get to know others in the program. You are not expected to always have the answer, but to be a guide and a resource for your Mentee. If you don't know the answer or feel you aren't the best person to Mentor your Mentee through a particular issue, point your Mentee in the right directions. You could also point your Mentee in the direction of another resource.

Suggested Activities for Mentoring

Facility Tours; Personality Inventory & Review Results; Invite Mentee to Board Meeting of Mentor's Organization; Attend Each Other's Annual Meetings; Read John Maxwell's "Mentoring 101" Together

Sample Questions from a Mentor to a Mentee:

What type of leader do you want to be?

What did you learn in your last seminar?

What do these lessons mean to you, personally and professionally?

Sample Questions from a Mentee to a Mentor:

What have you learned from your mentors?

How did you get into this business?

What's the thing you like most about your job?

What's the thing you like least?

What are the 3 greatest mistakes you've made in your business, and what have you learned from them?
